

Lebanese Problematic Summary Isratine

Imagine, after sometime, the establishment of the state of "Isratine", as proposed by the late Muammar Gaddafi, in occupied Palestine. The President of the Republic would be Palestinian, or say Muslim, and the heads of the House of Representatives and the Cabinet Israelis, or say Jewish (or Hebrews). And there would be a central constitution enacting laws to be imposed on everyone regardless of religious, cultural, national, civilizational or sentimental differences, but preserving the civil status issues and binary equity conditions, yet calling for their abolition one day.

Hebrew would then be used as a literary and thus official language, as well as a liturgical language (that is, for religious / praying purposes), and only the Hebrew alphabet would be used, even to write the Palestinian vernacular language, the Arabic alphabet being totally forgotten.

Palestinians would also be convinced that their dialect is the "vernacular Hebrew language" (the "Semitic" languages being relatively close), and that they are Hebrews because they speak Hebrew, and that Isratinians are "one people" in "one common way of life".

Palestinian history and all its features would be concealed except what is impossible to hide, and what remains apparent is considered to belong to a people who has disappeared.

The Palestinians would then emigrate by the hundreds of thousands, and the Hebrews would enjoy a supremacy in demography. Isratine would then join NATO and the Western community to embrace its issues, and take its side in regional and global conflicts.

But at every major turn, the "Isratinian" People would clash in a military civil war, or otherwise continually clash via a demographic, political and economic cold war, the concern being the impossibility of explaining this phenomenon due to the erasing of national consciousness of both sides, and especially that of the Palestinians.

The Muslim and Jewish leaders would then pledge to protect each their "side", and they would hence access the political scene especially as warlords, and they would impoverish the population with no possibility to replace them, wreaking corruption without any accountability. And if the Palestinians would consider interpreting political issues suiting their own entity, they would be labeled "isolationists" in relation to the West.

But over time, Isratinians would have had to accept each other at the personal and municipal levels in the rare mixed villages / neighborhoods, or at governmental level or on media, of course only where intercommunal social interaction would have obliged. Perhaps this would have been the only positive aspect.

They would thus head for a federal system or a peaceful partition to end tragedies after re - reading History impartially and going through an honest reconciliation, all while recognizing the political, cultural and existential rights of both sides, whereby the Palestinians would understand the need to accept the loss of a geographical area for the occupier, and the Israelis would acknowledge that moving forward is too costly and seems, as of now, bound to fail.

This is Lebanon, in short.
