

Worlds of the World

With a Twist on Lebanon, Islam and specifically Druzes, as well as Alawites.

Dr. Marc J. Achkar, M.D. and researcher into the Lebanese Dilemma

A culture is a combo of four pillars,

1- A symbolic structure, meaning a shared set of foundational true stories and myths, founding ancestors and heroes, sacred places, iconic symbols or motifs, collective traumas or victories, a sole backdrop history... and emotionally charged references through which it recognizes itself within a shared ethnical intuition,

2- A temporal structure, meaning the way it experiences historical time and organizes memory across generations (historical turning points, commemorations, shared generational milestones, a calendar and feasts...),

3- A artistic structure, which is a shared aesthetic and expressive system through which a People communicates meaning (language families and scripts, literary forms, humor styles, emotional expression norms, architecture, painting, sculpting, music, poetry and storytelling patterns, educational traditions, social entertainment...),

4- And a social structure, which includes social laws (the moral code), moral vocabulary structuring civic life, ritual life, kinship, proper names, character and temperament, greeting rituals, everyday habits (cuisine, outfits / attire styles...), political organization / legal - administrative models (Republic, Tribe, Kingdom...).

Of note, religion (Cosmology & eschatology) is an issue that is parallel to culture (ex: many ethnicities believing in Christianity, many ancient cultures exchanging gods and cults), but it affects culture through infiltrating several of its pillars via its teachings, rituals and representations.

A culture defines an ethnicity (a People / nation / "umma" / "shaab" / "qawm", the latter 3 in Arabic). Ethnicities rely, through their pillars, on a cornerstone, which is a "social normative authority". A social normative authority is a matrix offering the deep primary grammar code and symbolic language of legitimacy through core vocabulary of moral legitimacy, historical reference horizon, authority archetypes and symbolic cosmology (the deep metaphysical assumptions). Ethnicities worldwide are regrouped, based on existing social normative authorities, into civilizational currents called "worlds".

Social normative authority is known to generally emanate from "Originally Levantine"* (now roughly UN Human Rights Charter / Universal Declaration of Human Rights), Dharmic (aka Indic), Confucian, Islamic, or Ancestral* matrices. There still are, worldwide, around a dozen or two of cases of micro - worlds ("micro" as per population count), the major ones being the Hebraic micro - world and Gypsie micro - world.

* See below.

 It is not a binding treaty, just a declaration; this is why no country voted against.. Voting occurred in 1948. There were 58 states. Saudi Arabia abstained from voting due to Islamic conflict. The 8 other Muslim countries that voted for (Afghanistan, Pakistan, Iran, Iraq, Turkey, Syria and Egypt) were newly independent and seeking legitimacy / Yemen was absent. Back - then - "White" - Run South Africa abstained because of apartheid, and communist countries abstained because of consideration of lack of guarantees as to economic and social rights. Christian - run Lebanon voted for, with Charles Malik playing a pivotal role in the ratification. China voted for, and became communist in 1949.

 "Dharma" means "what holds" and is a set of moral orders. (Refer in the comparison table below).

In fact, Islam, as is, presents a distinct social normative authority, and in theory quasi - fully governs all pillars. Only for a few, relatively superficial, exceptions (men's outfit, local cuisine, some habits and customs, spoken language and at moments literary language...), penetration of previous - to - Islam ethnicities' pillars may be variable. However, aforementioned "cornerstone" implies being governed by Islamic concepts of law, legitimacy, and identity boundaries. Of note, concerning political organization, theocracy remains the norm, though often masked in practice by administrative secularism.

This is why one cannot be a French / American / Ethiopian / Coptic / Canaanite / Assyrian / Persian Muslim, nor a Muslim French / American / Ethiopian / Coptic / Canaanite / Assyrian / Persian, unless if not being a true Muslim, which means there would be hypocrisy, or in case of "taqiyya" (faking to infiltrate, then, when possible, dominate) or, to give a chance to goodwill, confusion.

Thus, Muslims retain relatively superficial elements from their ethnicity that was previous to Islam depending on penetration of Islam unto the pillars, as mentioned earlier, but their identity, based on the four structures, and thus their ethnicity, remains Islamic; that is why they sociologically are, and they themselves say that they are, an "umma", meaning a People. And since they do not share their cornerstone, i.e. their social normative authority, with other ethnicities, they remain a world apart, and it is not absurd that they have ratified the "Cairo Declaration for Human Rights in Islam" in 1990.

Of note, all pre - Islamic Peoples of the Arabian Peninsula, meaning Arabs, Hejazites, and the 5 Yemeni Peoples, became Muslims, which means that they disappeared as entities, because not even 1% of any of those seven entities remained unislamized. And it is well known that the term "Arab" as in "ethnicity" was re-introduced in the 1880's by the Arab renaissance, in areas close to Islam's epicenter (Egypt till Iraq), after falling out after the Muslim conquest. Said re - introduction was based on use of the Arabic language which Islam had appropriated. Add to this that Muslims of the Arabian Peninsula, having conserved several remnants of the previous Arabic pillars, are often considered as being "the true Arabs" of nowadays, relative to the Peoples of the current Arab world. But sociologically speaking, none of all these are Arabs, nor Hejazites, nor of the five Yemeni Peoples. They are simply Muslims, because the bulk of their pillars, and even more, their social normative authority, are Muslim, and not at all Arabic.

This leads to a further point:. After the Arab renaissance, the countries that were formed in that region from Egypt to Irak adopted Arabic as their formal language, and thus their Muslims (and even non - Muslims) became known as Arabs (or Arab Muslims for those Muslims). But they have nothing to do with previous Arabism except for the formal language. They have no remnants of any Arabic pillars. Still, they are simply Muslims.

Hence, worlds are defined by a social normative authority. Cultures are modes of expression of a social normative authority and define ethnicities, thus Peoples. Each ethnicity has its own combination of elements for its pillars. Needless to say, ethnicities of a same world may share elements. These may also be shared, but to a lesser extent, among geographically adjacent ethnicities that may be classified within different worlds.

Of note, using the term "civilization" instead of "world" is not appropriate. A civilization is an ethnicity that has achieved certain milestones in diverse domains, like mythology, arts, architecture, business or technology (thus we have the Canaanite / Roman / Greek... civilizations). Not all Peoples reached the civilizational milestone. N.B.: Race is biological, based on DNA (previously based on "skin color"). It may or may not correlate with an ethnicity.

As example of elements of social laws emanating from "Originally Levantine" and "Muslim" social normative authorities, we have secularism / theocratism, equality between Humans or lack thereof, level of status for women and minorities, monogamy or polygamy, level of child protection, peacefulness or belligerence, right to self - determination and freedom of belief or lack thereof, supremacy of science on scientific domains or lack thereof, right to criticism or lack thereof, level of mercy, level of "forgiveness / pardoning", pity to the dead or lack thereof, level of individual freedom ...

Hebraism is analogous to Islam as the the cornerstone constituency (both religion and worldliness / deen wa dunya, and even more so, revealed by "God"), thus being a distinct People, and even being a [micro -] world apart, though both share some elements (lunar calendar, feast names, "Eye for eye, tooth for tooth", circumcision, ablutions...).

And hereby a reminder that the question is not about the religion per se (Christianity, Hinduism, Buddhism, Sikhism, Shenism (Chinese folk) and other ancestral religions, Shinto..., and Islam and Judaism in their religious aspects).

Clarifying more, Christianity (and possibly other religions besides Islam and Judaism) per se does not deal with any of the cultural elements. Why Christianity is structurally different than Islam and Judaism is because Jesus does not establish a legal system, a political order, a social hierarchy, a state or a codified civil law. He even does not argue those already established in Judaism (or in Canaanism for that matter, when he met the Canaanite women, or in Romanism). His message is ethical, eschatological, personal and non - coercive: "Render unto Caesar" is not incidental, it is structural.

The Church, later fueled by greed, egocentricity and obstinacy of its fathers, became a legal / regulated, political and administrative organization, and thus imitated Islam in infiltrating cultural pillars, even claiming and partially penetrating the symbolic pillar wherever Christianity made it, but it never overtook over the cornerstone, though almost did when it meddled into bioethical issues (abortion, suicide, masturbation, LGBT issues, euthanasia, assisted suicide...) and appropriated them, and was ousted in the last few centuries in the West, while still gripping unto it in the East. But this was / is contingent, not theological. Secularism remains the norm as a foundational principle for social normative authority of the so - called "Christian world", thus current Christians deriving said authority, through democracy and constitutionalism, from social norms evolving since before Christianity appeared, exactly like atheists and agnostics of their ethnic skin. But when facing liberals, Christians, if assimilated with conservatives, defend their stances, such as anti - abortionism, as being Christian teachings, since the Church has appropriated them. But these stances emanated from a morality previous to Christianity.

So the cornerstone, i.e. the social normative authority, answers the question "Who has the right to command society?". This cornerstone alone defines world belonging. In that sense, and reiterating, Islam is by itself not only an ethnicity per se, but a world per se. As is Hebraism. Thus, we have Divine Sharia for the Islamic world, Sage - ethics for the Confucian world, Dharma for the Dharmic world, evolving originally Levantine* social norms for the Originally Levantine world*, and Ancestralism* for the Ancestral* world, as well as Hebraism for the (tiny but mighty / overtly present) Hebraic world. * See below.

Now knowing that even ethnicities of a same world would better self - govern though independent countries, or at most unite through federal countries, it is of utmost difficulty, if not impossible, to unite ethnicities from different worlds. This is why mass immigration, which is a door to many conflicts even if incoming ethnicities belong to the same world (ex: see Romanian immigration into France, or suppose a French mass immigration into England), is an even more major problem when ethnicities belong to different worlds (ex: Indian or Muslim mass immigration into England). The practical difference in the latter example lies only in the adverse assertiveness of the immigrants. Immigrants are supposed to let go their original values and embrace local ones: in that example, French would try, Indians try, Muslims do not and even try to enforce their own values on the locals, pushed by their social normative authority.

As for what is called the Christian world, we have social normative authority that is not religious, is not ethnic, is not regional, is not related to a specific person, is not only Western, and it is composed of evolving originally Levantine social norms such as secular law, popular sovereignty / democracy, thoughts about Human rights, individual dignity and constitutionalism.

Now this evolving originally Levantine social normative authority defines a worldwide current that has not been officially named, though various terms are employed. Still, "Western" excludes Levantines who created it and participated in its evolution before Islam took over the East, leaving remnants that still belong to it, "Christian" is normatively false and excludes atheists, "cultural Christian" is a simple linguistic amendment of the previous, "Greco - Roman" (like "Anglo - Saxon") excludes modern legal revolutions and also excludes Levantines (Anglo - Saxon even excludes Greco - Roman), "Enlightenment" is chronologically narrow and excludes previous achievements, "Secular", "Civic" and "Constitutional" are pillars but not the cornerstone themselves, "Humanist" supposes others are not, and "Universal" is a mere claim.

This is where "Originally Levantine" comes in: it is defensible, coherent, and, importantly, honest in what it proposes. There is no claim of moral superiority, current ownership or exclusive authorship, nor of universalism or of geographical barring, and it avoids denying later contributions (Greek, Roman, Germanic, Slavic, Anglo - Saxon...). Of note, it must be acknowledged that Enlightenment translated ancient Levantine ethical intuitions into secular language and legal abstraction, but they remain a Levantine initiative. Is "Originally Levantine" "the most beautiful" name? Honestly? No. But that may actually be a virtue. Beautiful names tend to mythologize and seduce before they explain. This term explains before it seduces, survives scrutiny and forces people to ask why, which is good. Well, until a better proposition.

Of note, the only politically free People of the Levant is the so - called "Christians of Lebanon", ethnically the "Canaanites of Lebanon" (we have to mention "of Lebanon" since Christians of adjacent Tartous in Syria are also Canaanites), labeled by the West by "Phoenicians", as per the Greek appellation.

This shows why Lebanon is "wishfully" considered "a message for peaceful and loving co - existence", message that has failed at all levels when one considers Lebanon as having to be a state, a country, revolving around a unitary centralized Constitution, meaning bound by a single law to each issue. If Lebanon is taken in its original definition, a land, the historic "Land of Lebanon", the Lebanese state can be partitioned, and this would still fulfill the message, if the populations of the new - born states can accept the existence of each other and live and interact peacefully, each under their own social normative authority. As mentionned earlier, even federalism would be quasi - impossible, because the Land of Lebanon is straddling over two worlds, not just two ethnicities of a same world.

As for "Ancestralism", this name is not (only) so because Ancestral Peoples still act as they have acted still ancestral times, but because their ancestors are the active moral agents and the living archive of Law, sanctioning, blessing and punishing based on custom, tradition and ancestral laws, with normativity through continuity ("that is how we have always done it"), and rituals not being symbolic as for other worlds and as the word itself means, but being constitutive, where a broken ritual may mean misfortune or imbalance; thus, rituals in the ancestral world appear to other worlds as mere rituals, in the sense of repeated acts, but they contain fundamental meanings beyond mere rituals. Of note, all other worlds were ancestral until they each developed their own social normative authority.

Needless to say, the ancestral world unites through type of authority and not through a specific authority by itself which is common to all ethnicities of this world. This makes the ancestral world actually a collection of micro / mid - sized worlds (Amazonian, African, Australian (better than "Aboriginal")...). Then again, ancestralism being seemingly similar worldwide, this point remains of not much importance, thus we stick to the term "Ancestral world" uniting all these micro / mid - sized worlds.

A last note remains: it rarely occurs that some social groups digress from the moral code of their ethnicity (which is sometimes based on the ethnicity's main religion, be it Muslim, Buddhist...), but not from the ethnic order they belong to, because they still adopt much of the deep, as well as of the superficial, strata of the 4 pillars, and thus they remain part of the ethnicity and world they are in, thus forming separate communities, which end up socially unintegrated within the bulk of their ethnicity, and usually require political organization so that they can preserve themselves. But they remain intelligible only within their ethnicity. Belonging is primarily doctrinal or disciplinary, but becomes social with time. Yet, there is no ethnogenesis, and even more so, the social normative authority remains the same.

When this digression occurs through a belief reform, these communities, originally mere sects at the belief level, are known as "confessional communities" when distinct at the social level, and most are esoteric,* especially those within the Muslim umma.

* Esoteric: obscure; intended for or likely to be understood by only a small number of people with a specialized knowledge or interest.

As examples, we have, within the Islamic ethnicity (relative to the main sect, the Sunni), the Shiites (who are 10% of the Muslims, the Twelvers being 90% of Shiites), the Druzes, Syrian Alawites, Anatolian Alawites (Alevi), Ahl al - Haqq / Yarsan, Shabaks, Baha'is, Satpanthis, Sudanese Mahdists, Hausa off - shoots, Hurufi remnants...; within the Dharmic world, the Sikhs, Jains, Lingayats...; and within the Confucian world, the White Lotus...; of note, within the Originally Levantine world, we have the Amish, Hutterites, Old - Order Mennonites... confessional communities but these are disciplinary - centered, and not belief - centered, confessional communities, not defining neither a new theology nor new metaphysics, but reforming the main theology's practical application and social order.

To clarify more concerning Muslims, the corpus for the Divine Sharia for Sunnis and Shiites, which is their moral code, is the Coran and the Hadiths (as well as the Sira [Muhammad's biography] and Maghazai [his conquests]), though 10 - 20% of Hadiths are common to both, and some Coranic interpretations differ, while for the Druzes, Alawites and other aforementioned groups, they have each their own internal corpus / canon. Specifically, the Coran is generally acknowledged and reinterpreted esoterically within the aforementioned groups (Shiites aside) with the exception of the Druzes and Baha'is whereby, furthermore, the Coran is respected as a previous / exoteric divine revelation but superseded by later scriptures and therefore not normatively binding for daily life. Thus, their moral code (moral Law) is based on a closed canon, "the Wisdom Letters" (Rasa2el al - Hikma), itself based on their esoteric interpretation of the Coran and other texts, and they do not follow Islamic Law strictly.

However, at least within Druzes if not for Baha'is as well, the deep primary grammar code and symbolic language of legitimacy remains Islamic: Muhammad as a prophetic archetype, Coran as a primordial revelation, concepts like revelation (wahy), umma and tawhid, use of Islamic prophetic lineage and symbolic vocabulary, Islamic historical axis and consciousness, revealed wisdom, hidden esoteric knowledge derived from revelation (even if remarkably more within Druzes than within other Muslims), and all in all most elements of the four aforementioned pillars (sacred Arabic language, Hijri calendar...). The Coran is still recited socially (funerals...) with praying upon Muhammad, as well as retaining Coranic symbolic language and Islamic vocabulary of legitimacy. We can add to that their leaders and masses openly acknowledging their Islamism or at least their Islamicatism, and at least in Lebanon, not minding being "Muhammadites" in the Lebanese Code of Law, and participating in Muslim feasts such as Fitr and Adha, though these additions remain subjective. It cannot be all Takiyya (faking to avoid persecution).

All in all, this again certifies that Druzes remain a confessional community within the Muslim ethnicity, which, as said earlier, defines by itself the Muslim world, since Druze identity cannot be explained without the Muslim framework.

And again, what applies to Druzes applies to Sunnis (the major Muslim component) and Shiites, as well as other factions: they are all confessional communities within the Muslim umma / People / ethnicity and world.

It must be said though that specifically Druzes and Baha'is (and less so for aforementioned factions, but at least, still arguably, for Alawites) tend to be considered an ethnicity aside by some because of their distant digression from the core Islamic belief, yet still belonging to the Islamic world, which would thus have to be labelled as "Islamicate". This remains a matter of classification that we ethically keep open. At the political level, the same principle would apply, they would have to be considered as a separate social entity from Muslims as a whole whether they are considered an ethnicity aside or as a confessional community within the Muslim ethnicity, and for cases like Lebanon, the only case worldwide encompassing four relatively major communities (Sunnis, Shiites, Druzes and Canaanites (so - called Christians), if not five with the Alawites, who are much minoritarian), binary equality within the state would thus be based on "Canaanites and Islamicates" instead of "Canaanites and Muslims", with the same management within the Muslim / Islamicate group.

One could argue that within an Islamicate - considered group, in case of a federal order, in Lebanon's case, and disregarding Alawites for simplification but where the same extrapolated reasoning would apply, a binary equality would have to be proposed between Druzes on one hand and the Muslims on the other (with Sunnis and Shiites being represented based on proportionality within their Muslim ethnicity), considering each being an ethnicity; but knowing ahead that this would be impossible to suggest for various social and historical reasons (not to mention demographic as well, and if not religious too), this is a crucial element that emphasizes the scientific classification of Druzes as a Muslim confessional community among the Muslim ethnicity and not as an ethnicity by themselves among an Islamicate world. This still earns them cantons and representation based on proportionality within the Muslim ethnicity. Needless to say, partition solves all these issues regardless of their consideration as a confessional community or an ethnicity.

Finally, there is no sole formal classification that can be unicist. Definitions can differ; categorizations can differ. The importance remains the usefulness for practical achievement of peace through correct political organization in a way that gives communities freedom and stops oppression, all while avoiding minorities being a thorn in the flesh of their surroundings.

P.S.: Concerning the map, it is approximative when worlds' boundaries fall within a country. Mixed countries with percentages ranging from 30 to 70% were shown partitioned, as well as a few countries with percentages beyond this range but where geographical distribution was clear.

WORLDS SPECIFICITIES

	Originally Levantine	Islamic	Dharmic	Confucian	Ancestral	Judaic
Foundational Sacred References	Levantine - Greek - Roman - Anglo - Saxon heritage, Enlightenment, Human Rights Charters, Civic - secular model	Coran & annexes, Muhammad bin Abdallah, Prophetic Tradition	Vedas (first Hindu scriptures), Upanishdads (sacred treatises), Epics	Confucius, Classical Chinese Canon	Ancestral Oral Traditions, Mythic Ancestors, Sacred Landscapes	Torah (Written Law), Tanakh (Bible), Talmud (Oral Law), Rabbinic Reform
Vocabulary of Moral Legitimacy	Rights, Freedom, Equality, Citizenship, Rational law, Individual Dignity, Jesus' teachings	Umma, Halal / Haram, Takiyya, Submission, Caliphate, Isnad, Iijaz, Woudou`, Shariaa...	Dharma (right order), Karma (destiny from cause), Moksha (release from the cycle of rebirth), Nirvana (liberation)	Ritual Propriety (= Proper Conduct: Li), Humaneness (Ren), Heaven (Tian), Moral Principles	Balance with Nature, ancestral Perpetuation	Covenant, Umma (People), Halal / Haram, Submission, Commandment (Mitzvah), Shariaa
Historical Reference Horizon	Bronze Age to Classical Antiquity, Medieval, Renaissance, Late Democratic Revolutions	Islamic Foundational Era	Ancient Sages, Spiritual and Philosophical Schools	Ancient Chinese Dynasties and traditions	Myths, Narratives	Biblical Patriarchs, Rabbinic Reforms, Diaspora Survival
Authority Archetypes	Philosophers, Legislators, Judges, Citizens, Scientists	Prophet, Imam, Scholar, Revealed Law Interpreter	Sages / Gurus, Renunciants	Sages, Elders, Scholars,	Sages, Elders, Tribe / Clan leaders, Spiritual Mediators	Prophets, Rabbis, Torah Teachers
Symbolic Cosmology	Reason as arbiter, Secular legitimacy	Revelation and its Interpretation / Jurisprudence	Cyclical Time, Paths to Liberation though Cosmic Order	Heaven (Tian)	Tribal and Animism Cosmology	Revelation and Interpretation / Jurisprudence
Grammar Code	Originally Levantine Universal Evolutionary Principles	Divine Revelation Principles	Dharmic Harmony with Cosmic Order and Spiritual Insight	Confucian Li, Ren and Tian Principles	Nature Principles through Ancestors and Spirits	Divine Revelation Principles